Winners and losers from the Senate repeal bill

The Senate’s health-care bill, which passed in early July, is a major victory for Republicans and a major defeat for President Barack Obama. But the legislation is also a significant setback for some of the most vulnerable groups in American society.

The winners

Transgender patients: The bill includes language that allows transgender patients to be covered by health-care plans. This is a major win for transgender Americans, who often face discrimination and discrimination in health care.

Children: The bill includes provisions that expand Medicaid coverage for children, which will help millions of children get the care they need.

The losers

The bill would cut Medicare payments to hospitals and doctors, which could have a significant impact on the quality and availability of care for those who rely on Medicare.

Premiums: The bill would increase premiums for some people, which could make health care more expensive for those who need it.

Public health: The bill would cut funding for public health programs, which would have a negative impact on the health of millions of Americans.

Image sources: Photo by Andrew Harrer, Bloomberg, via Getty Images. Illustration by Philip Blakemore, POLITICO. Art by Amanda March

For more news and analysis from POLITICO, visit politico.com. Follow us on Twitter (politico.com) and Facebook (politico.com).